

OLD ST. PAUL'S.

The Honest Work Done a Century Ago—A Low Climbed Upward Amid Ricks of the Past.

N. Y. Evening Post.

The fact that the steeple of St. Paul's church is not of brown stone, but of painted wood, has probably been revealed for the first time to many thousands of persons who have watched the men at work upon the complex scaffolding which now adorns the venerable structure. The careful observer will see the men test each board or pit of wood separately, sounding it with a hammer or scraping the many coats of paint off in order to examine the wood underneath. The steeple of the church, which is an old man, and watches the repairs with more care than any one else, informed a reporter of the Evening Post this morning that the steeple was almost in the exact condition in which it was left by the builders in 1739. The church was finished in 1760, but money for the steeple was not forthcoming until thirty-three years later. The rotten wood, worn crenels and so soft in places that it crumbles away under the touch, has consequently been there for eighty-two years. Considering the lapse of time and the exposed condition of the wood-work of the steeple it is in remarkably good condition, which fact is attributed by the contractors now doing the repairs to the many coats of paint which have been applied. Upon many small bits of the outside sheathing which the reporter picked up in the churchyard beneath the steeple, the paint was a quarter of an inch thick, the steeple having been painted about ten times in the course of the present century.

Inside the steeple the wood of the beams and floor seems to be perfectly sound, although the floors and stairs are worn by several generations of bell-ringers and sextons. From the organ loft in the church, at which point the tower proper may be said to begin, the inside of the tower and steeple is divided into thirteen stories of about seven or eight feet in height each. Step-ladders go from a trapdoor in one floor to the trapdoor in the next. Upon the lower floors the rooms are of very fair size—about twenty feet square; as the visitor climbs up they become smaller until at the level of the clock dials the room is barely eight feet square, and a story above that begins a narrow staircase which winds around the inside of the spire. The journey through thirteen floors up this staircase is not without its perils, on account of the dim light, although some of the rooms receive plenty of light from the latticed windows at the four sides of the tower. In many of the larger rooms has been stored church material which has seen its day, and would probably well repay an antiquarian's visit: Sunday-school decorations and finery, chests of clerical vestments, paint and brushes, bits of rotten rope, pieces of former clocks including the hands—all this rubbish has here found a safe resting place.

At the level of the large latticed windows half way above the roof of the church are the two bells which in former days summoned the Knickerbockers to worship and now serve to remind the surging, busy crowd below that the aim and end of this life is not money-making. Upon the top of the smaller bell, which is hung for a quarter of an hour every day by the favored business men of the neighborhood and may possibly attract a few of them to the Lenten services, is the inscription "Mears of London, fecit, 1797." When this bell first began to ring the site of the Astor House was a cornfield. Into the space and dust of the belfry comes the hum of life below, the ceaseless rumble and life of the city. By climbing between some of the massive beams which at about the level of the belfry begin to fill the tower like a network, the reporter is able to catch a glimpse out of the latticed windows, and to see the crowd assemble around the Evening Post bulletin board upon the last tidings of the President. The large bell has no inscription upon it. Little to be done inside the tower and steeple; outside the woodwork will be largely new. Many heavy carloads of the old wood have been taken away, and huge piles still remain on the ground.

As the reporter was leaving he remarked to the old sexton who had remained behind that the graveyard behind St. Paul's church would sell for a good sum of money.

"Yes, sir," answered the sexton, "the corporation has been offered two million dollars; but it will never be sold. The persons buried here bought the plots out and out with the expectation of sleeping there till the last trumpet shall sound. It would be an outrageous breach of faith to dig up their dust and sell the land. No more have been sold here for many years, and very few bones remain in the graves; all is dust. The graves on the Vesey street side are most of them at least a hundred years old and many of them much older. Some years ago Ex-Mayor Kingsland wanted the bodies of his father and mother disinterred and taken to Greenwood. They had only been here fifty years, and yet a little box eighteen inches square with a curtain all that we found. To attempt to move the remains to another graveyard would result in a sacrilegious jumble of bones and dust. Beside, these burial plots do not belong to Trinity, but to the heirs of the persons buried here, and it would be impossible to find one out of twenty of the persons whose consent would be necessary to such a removal. No, sir, this graveyard will remain, no matter what the value of the land is. It is not unhealthy, for there is nothing here but dust. And the church will remain, too. Its congregation is made up of the poor people who live in this neighborhood and who would sorely miss its services and free pews."

The stone work of St. Paul's will not be touched at all in excellent condition. The repairs to the steeple will be finished in about two months.

Dramatic Scene in an Ohio Prison.

Yesterday was visiting day at the city jail, and the number of persons who applied to see relatives or friends who were incarcerated was larger than it had been for some time. The crowd had been surging to and fro for hour or two, when a lady walked and said to Turney Birnbaum:

"I want to see Ecker, who is charged with killing Mr. Seeger."

Mr. Birnbaum understood the woman to say that Ecker was her brother, and without more than turning from his desk, shouted to the guard in attendance:

"Call out No. 9."

Meaning the number of the cell in which Ecker was confined. The woman moved up to the lattice work through which the prisoners converse with their friends. Presently Ecker came down, and the moment he reached the lower step the woman, pulling a pistol from the folds of her dress, shrieked out:

"You killed my brother and I'll kill you."

She had cocked the pistol and thrust the muzzle almost through the iron grating. She pulled the trigger and down came the hammer, fortunately on an empty cylinder. The weapon was a 38-caliber of Smith & Wesson's make, and had five loaded barrels, only one being empty. On this the hammer fell. Had it not been some one would have been injured or killed. When the woman saw the click of the pistol, Mr. Birnbaum jumped up, and with one bound got to the woman and grabbed her arm. At the same time Jake Kelly, the superintendent of the court house, who happened to be present, caught her around the waist. After a pretty stout tussle the woman was disarmed, and an explanation asked. She said she was the wife of John McGrath, an old sailor of the deceased Henry Seeger. She said that Ecker had killed her brother, and she was bound to kill him. She said that she might not be able to do it this week or the next, but that she would finally succeed. While Mr. Birnbaum was endeavoring to disarm the woman Ecker ran up stairs, and ten minutes later was found cowering near his cell with a face completely blanched. Mrs. McGrath was detained for a short time, and then sent home in charge of her brother-in-law, T. J. McGrath, the well-known constable of the Twenty-second ward. Subsequently her husband called at the jail and asked for the pistol, he claiming that it belonged to him. His request was, of course, refused. He stated to Mr. Birnbaum that his wife had shown signs of brain affection for some time, and that he was afraid the killing of her brother had brought on temporary dementia. He promised to see that she was kept quiet, and consequently no order for arrest was issued.

A HALF MILLION IN HORSES.

The Fashion Stud-Farm Where Goldsmith Maid is Queen.

From the Trenton State Gazette.

The Fashion stud-farm, situated about a mile and a half east of this city, on the state road and opposite the coal station of the Pennsylvania railroad, is believed has not an equal in this country. It was purchased about ten years ago by the well-known horseman Ruid Doble and Charles H. Kerner, for H. N. Smith, the prominent New York banker, and was not visited by the latter till nearly a year after it became his property. Since that time contiguous lands have been purchased by Mr. Smith, until his farm now contains something over 365 acres, nearly all of which is under the highest condition of cultivation, and through which runs a never-failing stream of water. It was not at first Mr. Smith's purpose to establish an extensive stock farm, but, owning the celebrated Goldsmith Maid and other fine blooded horses, he bought the farm on which to keep and breed them. Becoming more and more infatuated with stock raising and breeding, Mr. Smith has increased his stables and improved the establishment until they now represent a moneyed value of about $500,000, his horses alone being valued at $300,000. With the single exception of Robert Bonner, Mr. Smith has probably spent more money for horses than any man in the United States.

With a view of placing before our readers a description of this interesting stock farm, a reporter of the State Gazette recently made a visit thereto. The first thing to which the reporters' attention was directed was the speeding of Ebony, a handsome Knox colt, and Dutch Girl, on the mile track. Then the large square building used for a stock house, and the carriage room, etc., adjoining the grand stand, was visited. On the ground floor, facing the track, is the reception room, whose fineness of finish almost beggars description. Its ceiling is very high and the whole is finished in oak. The walls are covered with heavy English leather paper. The elaborate mantle is of oak, with unique tiling, and the furniture is rich, heavy and antique, and upon the floor is a gorgeous Wilton carpet. Just back of the reception room is the office and harness room, furnished in oiled pine and handsomely furnished. In the rear of this room is the large carriage repository, also finished in oiled pine. The second story contains a large hall, which will be fitted up for a billiard room, and ten bed rooms elegantly furnished for the accommodation of invited guests. On this floor is also the room of the veterinary surgeon. In the cupola of this building is a tank, made of boiler iron, with a capacity of 3,500 gallons, which is kept filled by a steam pump in the basement, which has a capacity of 150 gallons per minute. The water is obtained from a well 21 feet deep and nine feet in diameter, and holding 8,000 gallons. To further guard against fire, five fire-plugs are contiguous to the stables and are supplied with about 400 feet of hose. In addition to this the Trenton fire department could be summoned by telephone.

In the cellar of the carriage-house, besides the force-pump, is a steam engine and boiler, which heats the water and cooks the food for the horses. Besides this structure there are the following: Main barn, with 20 box and 40 single stalls; the colt barn, with 24 box stalls, capable of holding 48 colts; the training stable with 50 box stalls; the grand stand barn, with 17 box stalls, for brood mares and colts; the stallion stable with five box and single stalls; the grain barn, recently built by Cumberly & Kafer, and probably the largest barn in this section; the cow barn; a barn for the farm work horses and mules; a barn for farming implements; the blacksmith shop; grand stand with seating capacity of 2,000; Mr. Smith's residence near the race track, which he occupies about three months each year; General Manager Riddle's residence near the entrance and four other residences for employees. Inside the large square formed by the stock barns are large and substantial paddocks in which to exercise the horses in the winter. Inside of the square formed by the paddocks is a manure pit six feet deep and 150 feet square, with a cement bottom. Into this pit all the manure is deposited daily.

The proprietor of this grand establishment, H. N. Smith, as we said before, is a prominent New York banker, and except in the summer resides at Fifth avenue and Forty-fifth street, in the city named. He is in the prime of life, and his wealth is estimated at over $1,000,000. He is a thorough lover of horses, and while he spends hundreds of thousands of dollars in developing superior stock, he is in no sense a gambler or jokey. Thus far his stables are believed not to have been self-sustaining but they are now rapidly becoming so. Among the horses many of which have a world-wide reputation, are four service stallions, 21 yearling colts and fillies, 16 two-year-olds, 13 three-year-olds and 35 brood-mares, altogether, with a number of boarders, making 150 head of superior blooded stock. The most noted animal on the Fashion Stud farm is Goldsmith Maid, who was foaled in 1857, and has a record of 2:14.

The Hog Crop of the West.

Reports received from most of the western states indicate that fat hogs will be scarce and high at the season when they are generally marketed. There is not the usual number of pigs in the country, and there is a deficiency of food with which to fatten them. Two causes have operated to reduce the number of stock hogs. The cold weather during the early spring months killed many young pigs in Iowa and other western states. The high price of pork during the summer months induced farmers to dispose of most of the hogs that were in a condition to be slaughtered. There has been no unusual mortality among hogs since the commencement of warm weather. Cholera and some other diseases are reported in a few sections, but they have not been general in any state. It must be remembered, however, that cholera is most likely to prevail and prove fatal after hogs are put on a diet consisting of little else than corn. The condition of hogs is generally reported as poor for this season of the year. Those that were in good flesh are passed into the hands of the butchers. In Ohio and Indiana, where hogs are generally kept in pasture during the summer, a severe drought has prevailed for nearly two months. As a consequence, the grass and clover have dried up, and in some places there is a scarcity of water. In these states farmers are reluctant to feed corn to hogs at present prices, as they think it will bring more money if sold in the fall, when most sections there is or will be sufficient corn to fatten the hogs and to supply the other home demands for this crop. The prospect is that the proportion of hog and hominy will be about as usual. The reports appear to show that the number of hogs in the West is at least 25 per cent. below the average at this time of year; that they are of small size and in poor condition. The prospect for heavy hogs that will yield a large amount of lard is exceedingly poor. In some of the best counties of Illinois and Kansas many heavy hogs will most likely be fattened. Although American pork is prohibited from entering several foreign countries, western farmers need be in no fear of low prices during the present season.

Wm. McCartney, 88 Lloyd street Buffalo, N. Y., fell and sprained his ankle. His employer, H. Anderson, 34 Main street, procured a doctor, Thomas Electric Oil, and he says that a few applications enabled him to go to work as usual.
